Judaism Knows No Dividing Line in Matter of Charity

גמ"ס סא"א

By Dr. Abraham Cronbach.

In discussing the subject of the South Bend Jews and the Good Will movement, I cannot resist the prompting to quote two beautiful passages from the Talmud—the great Jewish compendium of law, folklore, tradition, etc.

Accompanying this article is a picture of these passages made from a transcription by my friend, Sam Unger, South Bend's ablest Hebrew calligrapher.

The first passage should be translated thus: "In a city, inhabited by non-Jews and by Jews, charity collections are made jointly from Jews and from non-Jews, and relief is accorded jointly to needy Jews and needy non-Jews."

The second passage should be translated: "Our sages have taught: 'Relief shall be accorded to the needy of the non-Jews as well as Jews, visits paid the sick of non-Jews as well as of Jews, burial provided for the dead of non-Jews as well as of Jews—all for the sake of Good Will.'"

From times immemorial, it has been in Judaism both teaching and practice to observe no dividing lines in matters of charity.

Hearty cooperation in our Good Will movement is consequently to be anticipated from Jewish people of all types and classes.

The Orthodox Jew will be responsive because, so doing, he is but carrying out the spirit of the ancient traditions which he loves and reveres.

The Reform Jew who no longer observes the old customs, and is no longer swayed by the traditional sentiment will, as a citizen of South Bend, be responsive to the needs and opportunities of South Bend.

The charitable services rendered the Jewish sick by the St. Joseph hospital, Epworth hospital, Visiting Nurse association and Anti-Tuberculosis league; the benevolence shown toward Jewish children by the Orphan's home, the playground association and the Y. M. C. A., the varied and valuable guidance and advice furnished Jewish charity workers by the Associated Charities, will be remembered during Good Will week. I feel confident that there will be generous enthusiasm and liberal giving among the Jews of South Bend.
